

Boston Bruins Celebrated Stanley Cup with $100,000 Bottle of Ace of Spades

Remember when we told you about the Dallas Mavericks taking the Larry O’Brien Championship Trophy to Club LIV in Miami? During that party night at the club, owner Mark Cuban reportedly dropped $110,000 including his $20,000 tip. The biggest expense on the bill was a bottle of Ace of Spades champagne he bought for the team. Well the Boston Bruins took home the Stanley Cup a few days later, and they outdid Mark Cuban’s bottle of champagne.

The Bruins took the Stanley Cup Trophy to club Shrine at Foxwoods Saturday night. During their celebration, they drank from a 30 liter bottle of Ace of Spades “Midas” champagne that was double the size of the bottle Cuban purchased for his team. Zdeno Chara even drank the champagne from the Cup’s Bowl. Here’s another picture of the Bruins drinking the champagne:

Another look at the bottle of champagne (one of six such bottles in the world) and here's a look at their receipt (the celebration cost over $150,000!):

Good thing this is hockey and not baseball, because we know that wouldn't fly in MLB. But the Bruins didn't just drink champagne in the club, they also did some singing. Check them out singing We Are the Champions:

<http://youtu.be/NSfomB6LGYU>

As if all that wasn't enough, our friends at Busted Coverage tracked down pictures of Tyler Seguin stripping out of his clothes at the club. Yikes!

Photo Credits: Brian Spinelli, Brian Greenstein

About Larry Brown:

Larry Brown has over nine years of professional sports media experience, working in online, radio, and TV capacities. He recently was a nationally syndicated sports radio host. Follow him on twitter @LBSports